10-Minute Meeting Prep with Claude

One prompt. Ten minutes. You'll actually know what to say.

You knew the meeting was coming. You just didn't have time.

It's the same pattern every time. The meeting lands on your calendar. You mean to prepare — pull the deck, re-read the email thread, think through what you're actually going to say. Then the day arrives and you're walking in on fumes, skimming the agenda at the elevator.

The meeting goes sideways, or it just feels like a waste. Not because the topic was hard, but because you weren't ready. You leave with vague next steps, things you wish you'd said, and the quiet frustration of knowing you could have done better.

Claude fixes this in 10 minutes. Not because it's magic, but because it forces you to think through what you actually need before you walk in. You give it the context. It gives you the brief. You show up ready.

10 minutes of prep changes the whole meeting.

Copy this. Fill in the brackets. You're ready.

I have a [type of meeting] coming up.
Here's some context: [paste the agenda, an email,
your notes — even a sentence or two about what
it's about is fine].

Please give me:

1. The 2-3 most important things to be ready
to address or say
2. A few questions worth asking
3. Anything I should watch out for going in

What to paste as context:

Paste in whatever you have — a full agenda, the original email, bullet notes from a previous meeting, or even just a one-sentence description of what the meeting is about. Claude works with whatever you give it. More context = sharper output, but something is always better than nothing.

A client check-in — filled in

I have a client check-in coming up.
Here's some context: We were hired 6 months ago
for SEO. We've hit our keyword ranking targets, but organic traffic hasn't moved yet. The client is starting to seem antsy.

Please give me:

1. The 2-3 most important things to be ready
to address or say
2. A few questions worth asking
3. Anything I should watch out for going in

Claude's output:

- > What to say: Lead with the keyword win. Explain the rankings-to-traffic lag — it's normal and there's a timeline. Give them a rough window for when traffic should follow.
- > What to ask: Has anything changed on their end — new product, new team, site changes? And: what does success actually look like for them right now?
- > Watch out for: They may be measuring success by traffic only. Reset that expectation early, before it becomes the whole conversation.

That's a real prep brief. Three minutes to read. You walk in knowing what to say, what to ask, and where it might go sideways.

// Your turn

Pick one meeting. Try the prompt.

1. Open Claude at claude.com.
2. Paste the prompt from the previous page.
3. Fill in what you know about the meeting.
4. Read what comes back.
5. Notice how different it feels to walk in prepared.
